Clive's Comments

Happy New Year – Lunar. Last month we celebrated the Gregorian New Year on January 1st and this month we are celebrating the 'Lunar New Year' which includes (amongst others) the Chinese New Year. This is almost as early as it can be on 25th January. It doubled up with Australia Day weekend for first time in many years. The weekend was full of parties, marches and celebrations all over the country. This is what makes Australia such a great place in summer.

For many of us we have only ever known the Gregorian calendar as this is the one most Western Nations follow. We are now far more aware of the Chinese New Year but there are almost as many New Years as there are months. What is most interesting and symbolic of modern Australia and the openness of the world in 2020 is that we no longer see this as abnormal. Not only do we no longer see the multiple 'New Years' as strange we actually embrace many and join in and celebrate. We love to eat the food, drink the wine and enjoy the culture of all these different New Years. We are actually engaging with the social, moral and religious histories that make up the social life of all our various cultures. I love this about Melbourne and Australia.

Where I struggle is that we don't want to give this same consideration to our own history. We are an amazingly complex nation with minimal conflict of cultural issues. The average Australian is an open minded person who loves their country, appreciates the incredible freedoms we enjoy and has no real antipathy to any race or creed. In general we don't really care if a person is Muslim or Christian, Gay or Straight, Black or White, Left Wing or Right Wing so long as they are honest, open and don't force their opinions on us.

It seems okay to embrace some cultures or philosophies but not others and the acceptability seems to be based on what a vocal section of the media deem as ok or not. Personally I am tired of this. I have a strong set of values, ethics and philosophies and will discuss, debate and defend them in open and free discussion. However if I am with someone who disagrees with me I will...

...either discuss with them or if needed avoid the subjects that are contentious. I will never hold that person in contempt nor will I ridicule them simply because they don't agree with me. Unfortunately but I do not see this from many in the wider community. I follow Facebook in a limited manner as I like to see what old (and new) friends are doing. I do get tired of the rhetoric of some people – mostly on the left but also on the conservative side of politics.

Recently I read a series of emails attacking small businesses for not embracing huge wage increases and accepting that they should employ anyone no matter how they behave or look. I tried to point out that as a small business I had to keep wage rises in line with inflation and what I could afford. They came back calling me a 'capitalist pig' and it was their right to demand huge pay rises. I replied pointing out that if wages went up then cost of goods would also go up. I can't use the language they used in their replies attacking me personally. To them I was a horrible person with no saving graces.

I wasn't asking them to agree with me but to acknowledge that there was another view and there was some logic behind the discussion. The same happened in the gay marriage debate. I supported the move and am glad it is all over and we have moved on. However I accept that there are many people who due to their personal beliefs were not in favour. In fact I think it was in excess of 40% of the voting Australians. I know some personally and they are good people but they just felt that marriage was a religious issue and should be restricted to the heterosexual relationships. Yet some of these people were attacked with venom when they should have been accepted and even involved in discussions to change their views.

Come on Australia, let's do what we are famous for. Let's go back to treating everyone as an equal and a friend. If we don't like their politics then we can move on but leave out the violence. I travelled the world in the eighties and I was proud to be an Australian and was positive about how open we are. Let's go into 2020 with a positive and open attitude to all people and be open to their views. The way we are going it may be soon when your football team governs how you are viewed as a person. Even worse it might be that if you grow exotic plants and not native you are treated as a pariah. Your plant preferences will determine your place in society. You are seen as an environmental vandal if you plant anything not approved. Really if you plant anything it is positive for the planet as it creates another little oxygen machine.
